

the blood and sink back into left her as pale as ally. She loved the man, and they were happy words to her, and she was satisfied with them, though perhaps some women might have thought that they left a good deal to be desired. But Bessie was not of an exacting nature.

"At last she spoke.

"Are you sure," she said, "that you mean all this? I mean sometimes people say things of a sudden, upon an impulse, and then afterward they wish that they never had been atives, only keeping enough for servants, and have a united South Africa, like that poor silly man Burgers used to prate of, but I don't know how to bring about. A united South Africa, and Frank Muller to rule it! Well, such things have been, and may be again. Give me forty years of life and strength and we shall see."

Just then he reached the veranda of the house, and, dismissing his secret ambitions from his mind, Frank Muller dismounted and will be glad enough to marry Frankler; but then I will not marry her—no, if she goes on her knees to me—and she goes on her knees often enough. We will see what God and the English nation will do to protect you. God and the English nation. Call on the sheep and the horses; call on the rocks and the trees, and you will get an answer."
